Since the collapse of the Soviet empire, the "Great Game" in Asia has begun anew, with Russia, Turkey, and Iran competing for influence in the Caucasus and Central Asia . . .

This volume offers the first systematic analysis of the new geopolitics of southern Eurasia—a complex situation that is little understood and often distorted for polemical purposes. The expert contributors examine

- Russia's relations with both Turkey and Iran;
- Iranian-Turkish relations;
- Iran's and Turkey's relations with CIS member states;
- Russian policy vis-à-vis the CIS, with case studies of Russia's role in the conflict over Nagorno Karabakh and in the Tajik civil war;
- the dynamics set in motion by multilateralism in the region, with both positive and negative consequences;
- the prospects for development of a stable nation-state system in southern Eurasia.
